claiming that third-party publishers were delaying new games in fear of poor sales. Shortly after, Nintendo is now facing a class-action lawsuit for "deceptive and unfair business practices." M.J. Griffin, founder of the law firm representing the lawsuit, released a statement saying, "We launched this action to defend our client's rights and bring to light Nintendo's deceptive business practices." Specifically, he points to multiple reports of Nintendo declaring a Wii U to be out of stock due to low demand, despite the fact that there was still plenty of inventory sitting on store shelves. There's also the infamous case of Wii U games being recalled so that Nintendo could send nonfunctional units to retailers. Griffin also says that Nintendo is requiring retailers to purchase large amounts of Wii U consoles to qualify for Nintendo's incentive programs. "As our lawsuit alleges, Nintendo engaged in these practices to create a situation where it could demand exorbitant price concessions from retailers. All while falsely declaring its products to be unavailable for sale. Today, Nintendo is enjoying an unprecedented boom in the video game market, but because it engaged in these unlawful and unfair practices, Nintendo's
