The body's immune system could be hijacked by viral infections, turning them into chronic infections, and people with chronic infections may eventually suffer the consequences of this, including heart attacks and dementia. Since HIV specifically attacks the immune system, it's not surprising that the CDC recommends that people receiving HIV treatment should also receive antiretroviral treatment to prevent becoming infected by other viruses. In the last five years, several studies have shown a possible benefit to people with HIV also being treated with anti-herpes simplex virus 1. The fact that anti-herpes medication can be prescribed for other medical conditions also has been known for some time, but a 2004 study in the The Lancet found that the treatment was safe, even in very sick and often dying people. Possible side effects Before beginning any treatment for herpes, make sure to inform your doctor of all allergies, particularly to any of the drugs mentioned above and any other medications you take. People who have allergies to penicillin, for example, should not be treated with anti-herpes medication since it contains very similar ingredients. Women who have taken the birth-control pill may have a higher risk of developing the fungal infection thrush. If this happens, your doctor may recommend stopping the pill for a few weeks to allow the infection to clear itself. Those who have taken birth control pills but have not had any female genital surgery may develop infections and genital lesions, although they are more likely to develop thrush than women who have had the area surgically modified. Other possible side effects include: headache minor indigestion swelling and redness in the mouth, nose, throat and eyes Some people taking anti-herpes medication also suffer from tremors (shaking hands), and some feel the medication is actually causing their disease to be worse. Others find the medication either doesn't work or has them developing more symptoms than before. Using T-cells Even though the herpes simplex virus can't reproduce in the body, it can survive in the lining of the nerve cells called T-cells in the immune system. An alternative is 3e33713323
