Six trials were run with 10 different maize silages and a pasture plant (April subsp. prostrata L.) in order to examine and to compare the water holding capacities of silages varying with respect to water distribution in different parts of the mass. The dry matter losses before and after ensiling varied between 1.4 and 4.7%. The average moisture contents of the different silages were 14.5%, 18.7% and 21.9%. All tested samples had a low water holding capacity of about 80 g/kg DM within one week of ensiling. The difference between dry matter losses of the silages was not significant. It is discussed that the water holding capacities of silages are connected with the water distribution in the sample.This is not a link to an evil world, one of them that is the product of an unforeseeable, post-intellectual and post-ethical abnormality. This is the real world, the real me and others like me. This is the world I was talking about in the other blog. I'm sure you got my drift though and all I'm asking is for you to indulge me on this but the thing is I have to do it tomorrow morning before I go to work. That's all it is. Would you be so kind as to send me a PM letting me know you read this? Another reason I ask you would be that I've been putting this up on almost every site I've ever looked at with zero response, and I hope that if it hits a site known for it's underground, respectable literature that you will take the trouble of directing them to this website and asking them to send me a PM. I think it would be good for us to have some kind of communication for mutual benefit. I've been reading online for years, but nothing beats the time when you're sitting at home with nothing else to do. I was just sitting around the house doing nothing in particular until I got bored. I decided to open up a Gmail account just to get online and start putting up flyers for this kind of stuff. I'm looking for out-of-town people to meet, from all types of people, and am open to doing meet-ups in exchange for payment 9df0af710a
