Franck Spadone UnratedÂ .[Lung transplantation:

why not accept a great success?]. Lung transplantation (LT) is considered to be the standard therapy of end-stage pulmonary insufficiency. From 1964 to 1997, 153 lung transplants have been performed in our institution. The survival for the first 2 decades is excellent and exceeds that of the general population. Success was always obtained in infants and in patients with cystic fibrosis, but transplantation was also applied in other indications where patients were young and without specific pulmonary disease. Despite increasing attention to the field and general improvement of results, lung transplantation is very much rejected in the USA and in most European countries. This wide rejection rate is a serious challenge to our profession. The main factors for this negative attitude are: 1) the lack of national and international registries and no clearly established criteria for the diagnosis of end-stage pulmonary insufficiency; 2) the supposed increase in number of pulmonary insufficiency in the general population with an already high mortality rate, whereas the actual number of LT in pulmonary insuff
