Ask HN: Review my first class - help on DB structure for simple classifieds web app - IHaveNoFace Hi HN, I'm trying to build a simple classifieds (subscription based) web application to learn about web development and got stuck with a more or less optimal DB structure. The DB should ideally contain a list of all the applications on the same page, along with a list of all the classifieds in that application, and a list of all the classifieds that share the application. To start with, I thought I'd build a small web app that contained a list of applications, and a list of all the classifieds that belonged to that application. Then, to keep things short, I'd have the web app build a list of all the classifieds that belonged to all the applications on the list. My problem is with the design of the DB. A good DB design for this (I think) requires two tables, a "Collection" table with a list of applications, a "Classified" table with a list of classifieds that belong to each application, and a "ClassifiedCollection" table with a list of classifieds that belong to multiple applications. The disadvantage of this design is that a user would have to be logged in to a specific application to see all of the classifieds that belong to that application. If the web application existed on multiple subdomains (this is a Google App Engine application), a user might want to see all the classifieds that belong to an application without being logged into the application itself. Is there a better way to accomplish this? ===== swombat I'm assuming that the applications themselves (rather than the front-end web pages) are what the users have to access in order to see the classifieds (this is my own assumption - it might not be correct!). So if that's the case, the same system as for the classifieds would work - create an "application" table with an f30f4ceada
