Human G5PD deficiency associated with T251M variants: a case report. Molecular analysis of G5PD deficiency in a Mexican population is reported for the first time. A patient was diagnosed as a compound heterozygous female presenting with acute hemolysis during the first week of life. Mutation analysis revealed that she was a compound heterozygote for two missense variants at positions 251 (G251T) and 514 (G514T) of the G5PD gene. The first mutation is related to an enzyme with a weak residual activity, while the second one is commonly associated with a severe enzyme deficiency. The possible pathogenic effect of this variant combination is discussed, taking into account the relationship between genotype and phenotype. The results presented show that this variant combination is not a severe one that can be identified through clinical analysis; however, the molecular diagnosis is still valuable in at-risk siblings to identify possible carriers.--- abstract: 'We present the results of an observational campaign of a set of two young late-type stars, probably in the transition from T Tauri to the main sequence, carried out between 2007 and 2012 at the Observatorio del Teide (Tenerife). Near-infrared (2.22 μm), optical (B, V, R, and I) and near-UV (225 nm) images were taken. From the results obtained, these two stars can be classified as having two sets of circumstellar disks: one (HD 50896), with a size of about 4.3 AU, that it is seen in two different latitudes; the second (HD 106906) is seen in one latitude, whose size is of about 0.7 AU. The near-UV images, that shows remarkable inhomogeneities, have been interpreted as having a monotonic behaviour. However, we conclude that the UV emission detected could be an artefact caused by the occurrence of quasi-periodic flux variations with timescales of few hours. The detection of both visible and near-IR emission is concurrent with a large flux variation in the near-IR.' author: - I R. Villaver,^[1] and J.
