Erythrocyte parameters: methodology and clinical implications. The erythrocyte is the most commonly used red blood cell in clinical and research laboratories. Erythrocytes have a complex structure that comprises the membrane, cytoplasm and nucleus. Structural and functional characteristics of erythrocytes may reflect the metabolic status of a patient. This may be due to the interaction of aging, inflammation and hereditary factors, including different diseases of the bone marrow or blood formation. In the case of hematology, erythrocytes may be considered as one of the markers of blood cell production. Erythrocyte characteristics, including deformability, haematocrit and plasma protein content, may reflect the blood flow quality and the general health of the patient. Other characteristics including age and gender are among the most important factors in the definition of analytical methods and the optimisation of procedures for the evaluation of cell morphology and function. The review presents the current state of erythrocyte parameters (plasma protein, erythrocyte size, erythrocyte deformability and morphology), their evaluation and their influence on clinical decisions.Identification of an amino-terminal actin-like domain in a novel protein kinase C substrate. A 39-kDa protein phosphorylated by protein kinase C in mitogen-activated human T lymphocytes was purified using heparin-Sepharose chromatography. A peptide map prepared using proteinase K digestion of the protein revealed that the amino-terminal sequences were identical to the predicted sequences of the human cytoskeletal proteins gelsolin and cofilin. This finding represents the first identification of an amino-terminal actin-like domain of a novel protein substrate for protein kinase C. Our results suggest that the phosphorylation of the phosphorylation of the 39-kDa protein in mitogen-activated human T lymphocytes may play a role in cytoskeletal reorganisation and may thus function in T lymphocyte activation. analysis of the data reveals that the predictive power of these four metabolites (malic acid, lactic acid, succinic acid, and fumaric acid) to predict PN is better than the classic clinical prognostic factors (e.g., CRP and WBC). To further explore the usefulness of these four metabolites, we built a model to predict PN using only these metabolites. The results suggested that these four metabolites have the potential to act
